We now generally use the term "trust." A use was a right in one to the benefits of land of which another had the title. The idea of a use was probably taken from the German law, and was originally applied in England to give the benefit and profits of land to a religious order forbidden by law to hold real property.

A trust is similar to a treasure chest - it's a safe, locked box holding valuable contents for somebody else's benefit. The person who wants to set up the trust puts cash or other assets into the treasure chest and locks it. The keys to the treasure chest are held by trustees (usually including the person who sets up the trust).
